This course is an economics course about international economics and business. At other universities this course might be titled International Economics. The objective of the course is to provide the student with the intuitive and the formal understanding of the economic principles of international economics. For the most part, the course focuses on the modern nonmonetary theories, causes and patterns of international trade. The gains from trade and the distribution of those gains, e.g. identifying the winners and losers from international trade, are clearly studied and explored. The powerful forces of globalization are discussed, analyzed and evaluated. NAFTA, the EU and other formal economic relations among nations are described and assessed. The economic effects of government policies that facilitate trade and those that restrain trade are analyzed.
